INVESTMENT COMMENTARY & REVIEW

Fourth Quarter 2024

Our outlook has more uncertainty than usual due to the upcoming transition in US political leadership. The new policies, if implemented as advertised, are likely to be inflationary. Tariffs, large tax cuts, and mass deportation, among other policies, have the potential to be quite inflationary on wages, wholesale and retail prices. For now, our outlook is unchanged, as we expect continued modest growth in overall economic activity.

For the quarter, the top contributing sectors included information technology, financials and materials. The weakest contributing sectors included health care, industrials and consumer discretion. On the individual stock level of analysis, the top performing individual stocks for the quarter included Innodata, Willis Lease Finance Corp and Intapp. The weakest performing individual stocks included Transmedics, American Superconductor, and M-Tron Industries.

PIA builds its portfolios from the bottom up, on a stock-by-stock basis. We do not invest based upon top-down macro-economic trends, although our positive stock selection often dovetails naturally with macro trends. The strategy is overweight industrials, health care, and technology, and notably underweight energy, materials, and financials. Our emphasis on particular economic sectors will evolve based upon emerging opportunities from individual stocks. At this time, we are particularly intrigued by a company that has a treatment for an incurable disease, a company that supports AI's evolving computational needs, and a company at the forefront of supplying AI companies with annotated data for large learning models (LLMs) and other parts of AI platforms.
